Supporting Information

Potential Cytotoxicity, Pharmacokinetics, and Excretion Properties of Sapindoside B from the Seeds of Nigella sativa var. hispida

Xingjiang Hu¹², Meihua Lin¹², Wei Zhu³, Yunliang Zheng¹², Qiao Zhang¹², Guolan Wu¹², Yunqing Qiu¹²⁴

Affiliation

¹Research Center of Clinical Pharmacy, First Affiliated Hospital, Zhejiang University, Hangzhou, China

²Zhejiang Provincial Key Laboratory for Drug Evaluation and Clinical Research, First Affiliated Hospital, Zhejiang University, Hangzhou, China

³Department of Biomedical Engineering, Zhejiang University, Hangzhou, China

⁴State Key Laboratory for Diagnosis and Treatment of Infectious Disease, Collaborative Innovation Center for Diagnosis and Treatment of Infectious Diseases, First Affiliated Hospital, Zhejiang University, Hangzhou, China
Correspondence

Prof. Yunqing Qiu

No.79 Qingchun Road
Hangzhou
Zhejiang Province
China

Phone: +86 571 87236537
Fax: +86 571 87236560
qiuyq@zju.edu.cn
Fig. 1S. MRM chromatograms of sapindoside B and IS obtained from rat urine samples: blank urine (A); urine spiked with standard solution (LLOQ) (B); urine sample after tail intravenous injection of sapindoside B (7.5 mg/kg) for 0~6 h (C).
Fig. 2S. MRM chromatograms of sapindoside B and IS obtained from rat feces samples: blank feces (A); feces spiked with standard solution (LLOQ) (B); feces sample after tail intravenous injection of sapindoside B (7.5 mg/kg) for 0–12 h (C).
Fig. 3S. Chemical structures of $\alpha$-hederin (A) and sapindoside B (B).